Walter Dean Myers was born on August 12, 1937, in Martinsberg, West Virginia, but grew up in Harlem, New York, after his mother's passing when he was just three years old. He began writing stories during his teenage years and continued to do so while working various jobs, including a stint in the Army at age 17. Myers' writing career took off after winning a contest sponsored by the Council on Interracial Books for Children in 1969, which led to the publication of his first book, Where Does the Day Go?. Over the course of his lifetime, he authored over 100 books for children and young adults, including Fallen Angels, Bad Boy, Darius and Twig, Scorpions, Lockdown, Sunrise Over Fallujah, Invasion, Juba!, and On a Clear Day. He collaborated with his son Christopher on several picture books that received notable awards. Myers was a recipient of multiple prestigious awards for his contributions to children's literature, including the Michael L. Printz Award, the Coretta Scott King-Virginia Hamilton Award, and the Margaret A. Edwards Award. Fallen Angels, one of Myers' most celebrated works, tells the story of Richie Perry, a Harlem teenager who enlists in the Army during the Vietnam War due to financial constraints. The novel delves into themes of war, friendship, and identity as Perry navigates his experiences in the jungle. Requesting the restoration of over half a million book restrictions, specifically those depicting realistic portrayals of war and soldiers' experiences from 1990-2000. This is based on the Library Association's list of most frequently challenged books during that period. (Note: I rewrote this text using the "ADD SPELLING ERRORS (SE)" method)
